Full of emotions: envy, hate, fear, hope, refusal and last but not least love. A father despises his daughter of fear she might be the result of a rape his wife had to endure nine month before the baby was born. Seven years ago he`s thrown her out of his house and the family. Now he is a dying man and her mother begs her to come home again, so she`ll save the cannery which was foundet by a great grandmother and now is threatened by bankruptcy. The homecoming is not only a chance for the heroin to become CEO of the firm, but also the last chance to change her daddy`s feelings for her. She has a long way to go, and on her path are more than one stones. But in the end she succeeds and wins not only the hearts of her folks back but also finds the love of her life. I`ve read some of Ginna Gray`s stories, but this was the most touching and the best developed. You struggle with the heroin on her thornful path to acceptance and love and you feel every injustice she has to endure by the hardheaded father of hers. Lean back and enjoy the book. You might shed some tears, but in the end you will celebrate with the charming and sassy heroin.
