A well written and thoroughly enjoyable fifth and final? episode to the Riss SeriesVon LegOnce again, CR Daems delivers.This fifth book, was like the previous four was well written and thoroughly enjoyable. CR handles the dissappointment of predictable human failings so well. The nature of the Riss is more symbiotic than parasitic to me and as long as the human part of the Human-Riss bond is benevolent to the Riss as a whole, both sides benefit. Ultimately, self serving and greedy humans aren't wanted as hosts by the Riss, so if they have a fair chance to reject a bonding before it happens, there is no danger of parasitic behaviour from the Riss side, only benefits. The Riss are like a conscience that are capable of stopping the dark side of human nature, but also offer great benefits. Where can I apply to see if I'm suitable for a Riss partnership bond? Would they have me?

Kurzbeschreibung With the galaxy-traveling aliens defeated, Nadya feels it's time that a new Leader be appointed to guide the Riss into the future. At last, they have the freedom to explore the stars with their own navy and their own home planet of Freeland. In the process of defeating the aliens, a friendly alliance between the Sadr Alliance of Stars (SAS), the United Free Nations (UFN), and the Riss nation developed. But the SAS and UFN navies suffered very heavy losses in the war. The Jahaba Peoples Union (JPU), its navy now larger and better equipped, sees an opportunity to conquer all three and to destroy the Riss they have always despised. Fear of conquest proves greater than loyalty for the SAS and UFN and it leaves the peace-loving Riss to stand alone.
